The effect produced on the mind by travelling depends entirely on the mind of a traveller and on the way in which he conducts himself. The chief ideas of one very common type of traveller is to see as many objects as possibly can. If he can only after his return home say that he has seen such and such a temple, castle, picture gallery, or museum he is perfectly satisfied. Therefore when he arrives at a famous city he rushes through it, so that he may get over as quickly as possible the task of seeing the principal sights, enter them by name in his note- book as visited or, in his phraseology 'done' and then hurry on to another city which he treats in the same unceremonious way.

Another kind of traveller in all he sees finds entertainment for the foolish, spirit of ridicule. The more hallowed any object is from history and religious associations or artistic beauty the more he delights to degrade it by applying familiar terms of vulgar slang that he mistakes for words. Such a one brings disgrace to nation by the rude insolence with which he laughs at foreigners and their ways, and everything else that attracts his notice of his feeble understanding.

At the end of his wandering he returns to his home a living example showing

How much the fool that hath been taught to roam

Excels the fool that hath been kept at home.

The disaster, the worst nuclear accident since Chernobyl, saw radiation spewed across a wide part of northeastern Japan, forcing the evacuation of some 100,000 people who lived near the plant and raising fears of contamination in everything from fruit and vegetables to fish and water.

Police estimated the crowd as 20,000 people, while organizers said there were three times that many people.
